

FEEDBACK – Things I LOVE

» 1. Landscaping: Soft Boundaries That Breathe

The way you've designed the plant landscaping around the house is brilliant — it creates a sense of privacy and calm while still keeping us connected to the surrounding neighbors.

It feels intentional, not isolating — like a soft boundary that brings peace without cutting us off.

» 2. Lighting: Atmosphere in Dialogue

The lighting fixtures are so well-chosen — they don't just illuminate, they complement the space.

The warmth and softness feel like they're in conversation with the interior — never harsh or clinical.

It's rare to live somewhere where the lights seem to “dance” with your sightline instead of disrupting it.

» 3. Entry Flow: Thoughtful Arrival

The arrival and departure experience is genuinely one of my favorite parts of living here.

The parking layout is incredibly intentional — easy access right at the entrance, which is a rare luxury this close to the city.

Even better, there's space for guests, and the ability to see your vehicle from multiple angles inside the house adds a layer of ease and security.

It feels like the whole entry sequence was designed for actual daily living — not just aesthetics.

» BONUS: Windows that Open the World

This might sound obvious, but the windows are one of the top three things every single person mentions when they visit.

They completely transform the experience of being inside — not just a place with great light, but a space that opens to the outside world.

You don't just see out — you feel connected.

It's the opposite of being boxed in by walls.

The views, the natural light, and the way the architecture frames it all — this is honestly one of the most powerful, mood-shifting design features of the entire place.

Even more impressive is how the space interacts with sunlight throughout the day — especially during late afternoon.

There's this intentional flow where light enters but never overwhelms. There are areas where you can rest, hide from the sun if it strikes hard, or let it bathe the room gently — it feels deliberate, like the house understands your body needs a break.

The way light plays with the textures and colors — outstanding.

My friend from NYC, an interior designer, visited and was floored. She literally said, "I want to shoot a film here." We toured the Caterpillar unit, and she was already writing the story in her head. It was real fire. Hilarious and so NY.

FEEDBACK - Room for Improvement

» 1. Entrance Light — Bug Magnet at Night

One small but noticeable design quirk is the exterior light by the entrance. Since it stays on continuously, it attracts a lot of bugs — especially in warmer months.

This can make coming and going feel less smooth, especially for those more sensitive to insects.

It's not a dealbreaker — just something a motion sensor or better placement could easily fix, bringing the experience in line with the rest of the home's thoughtful design.

» 2. Courtyard — Underactivated Beauty

Spending time at home makes me reflect on how spaces invite interaction.

In Mexico City, some courtyards weren't in plain view — just out of the way enough to feel like discoveries. You'd find people stretching, relaxing, or passing through — and those moments made the place feel alive.

Here, the central courtyard is visually stunning but centrally exposed. It feels more like a passageway than a place to linger.

A few subtle, sculptural additions could shift that energy:

- A concrete ping pong or chess table
- A small gym element — monkey bars or stretching post
- A minimal yoga corner — two angled walls to create calm

Nothing flashy — just useful, raw, and intentional.

Simple moves to transform it into a daily ritual space.
